

Icebreaker List

Icebreakers are a great way to open up any group meeting or discussion by getting people comfortable and talking. As you build trust within the group, you can advance to more personal or topic-specific icebreakers. Here are some example icebreakers you might consider using, or add your own:

- What's one word you'd use to describe yourself?
- Imagine you're in a movie – what would be your theme song?
- What's your favorite time of year and why?
- What's one object that's important to you lately and why?
- What's one thing that makes you special or unique?
- Name one thing that you're really proud of.
- Name one thing you really like about yourself.
- If you could visit any place in the world right now, where would you go?
- Name a person, dead or alive, famous or not famous, that you admire and say why.
- If you had to do something over again this past week, what would it be and why?
- Be honest about your day – how was it? Was there a high point? A low point?
- If you could learn any new skill, what would it be?
- If you had to define “safe space,” what would that mean to you? What would you want to be safe from? How could that space nourish you?
- What hopes and fears do you have for this group?
- If you could change one thing about yourself, what would it be and why?
- What's something that you really value in a partner or a friend?
